Ethics quiz 4 Flashcards | Quizlet There is a class of metaethical and normative views that commonly goes by the name 'divine command theory.' What all members of this class have in common is that they hold that what God wills is relevant to determining the moral status of some set of entities (acts, states of affairs, character traits, etc., or some combination of these). Theological Voluntarism (Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy) One might, of course, understand these divine commands as merely God's endorsement of a moral code whose authority is independent of the commands. But it seems natural enough to suppose that the authority of the Decalogue depends in some manner on the fact it is divinely commanded or the fact that the commands express God's will.
